

G I G A Working Papers

German  Institute of Global and Area Studies
Leibniz-Institut für Globale und Regionale Studien

GIGA Research Programme:
Violence and Security

Reshaping Political Space? The Impact of the Armed Insurgency in the Central African Republic on Political Parties and Representation

Andreas Mehler

No 116

December 2009

GIGA Working Papers serve to disseminate the research results of work in progress prior to publication to encourage the exchange of ideas and academic debate. Inclusion of a paper in the Working Papers series does not constitute publication and should not limit publication in any other venue. Copyright remains with the authors.

GIGA Working Papers

Edited by the
GIGA German Institute of Global and Area Studies
Leibniz-Institut für Globale und Regionale Studien

The GIGA Working Papers series serves to disseminate the research results of work in progress prior to publication in order to encourage the exchange of ideas and academic debate. An objective of the series is to get the findings out quickly, even if the presentations are less than fully polished. Inclusion of a paper in the GIGA Working Papers series does not constitute publication and should not limit publication in any other venue. Copyright remains with the authors. When working papers are eventually accepted by or published in a journal or book, the correct citation reference and, if possible, the corresponding link will then be included on the GIGA Working Papers website at <www.giga-hamburg.de/workingpapers>.

GIGA research unit responsible for this issue:
Research Programme “Violence and Security”

Editor of the GIGA Working Papers series: Juliane Brach <brach@giga-hamburg.de>

Copyright for this issue: © Andreas Mehler

English copy editor: Melissa Nelson

Editorial assistant and production: Christine Berg

All GIGA Working Papers are available online and free of charge on the website <www.giga-hamburg.de/workingpapers>. They can also be ordered in print. A fee of €5 will be charged for production and postage costs. For orders or any requests please contact:

E-mail: workingpapers@giga-hamburg.de

Phone: ++49 (0)40 - 4 28 25 - 548

The GIGA German Institute of Global and Area Studies cannot be held responsible for errors or any consequences arising from the use of information contained in this Working Paper; the views and opinions expressed are solely those of the author or authors and do not necessarily reflect those of the Institute.

GIGA German Institute of Global and Area Studies
Leibniz-Institut für Globale und Regionale Studien
Neuer Jungfernstieg 21
20354 Hamburg
Germany
E-mail: info@giga-hamburg.de
Website: www.giga-hamburg.de

Reshaping Political Space? The Impact of the Armed Insurgency in the Central African Republic on Political Parties and Representation

Abstract

This paper analyzes the declining importance of political parties in the Central African Republic (CAR). It argues that the problematic attitude of elites who are fluctuating between violent and peaceful behavior in order to further their own careers is jeopardizing both peace and democracy. The author hypothesizes that both political parties and rebel movements are failing to adequately represent (ethnoregional) interests, but that parties are suffering more in the course of the enduring war and the peace process. Patterns of elite behavior are presented as the main explanation for the resulting crisis of representation, with international actors' preference for inclusionary power-sharing deals seen as the main aggravating factor.

Keywords: Central African Republic, peace process, political parties, rebel movements, representation is a political scientist and the director of the GIGA Institute of African Affairs.

Dr. Andreas Mehler

Contact: mehler@giga-hamburg.de

Website: <http://staff.giga-hamburg.de/mehler>

Zusammenfassung

Umgestaltung des politischen Raums? Die Auswirkungen der bewaffneten Rebellion auf politische Parteien und Repräsentation in der Zentralafrikanischen Republik Dieses Diskussionspaper analysiert die schwindende Bedeutung politischer Parteien in der Zentralafrikanischen Republik. Argumentiert wird, dass das problematische Verhalten der Eliten, die zwischen gewaltsamen und friedlichen Handlungsweisen hin und her wechseln, um ihre eigene Karriere zu befördern, letztlich Frieden und Demokratie gefährdet. Der Autor stellt die Hypothese auf, dass sowohl politische Parteien als auch Rebellenbewegungen darin versagen, (ethnoregionale) Interessen adäquat zu repräsentieren. Allerdings leiden Parteien deutlich stärker im Verlauf des Kriegs- und Friedensprozesses. Verhaltensmuster der Elite werden als wesentliche Erklärung für die daraus resultierende Krise der Repräsentation dargestellt, während die Präferenz internationaler Akteure für inklusive Machtteilungsarrangements als hauptsächlich verschärfender Faktor angesehen wird.

Reshaping Political Space? The Impact of the Armed Insurgency in the Central African Republic on Political Parties and Representation

Andreas Mehler

Article Outline

- 1 Introduction
- 2 Parties and Cleavages, Conflict and Violence in the CAR
- 3 Peace Negotiations and Imperfect Dialogue Processes
- 4 Representation of Social Interests via Rebel Movements?
- 5 Conclusions

1 Introduction

This contribution examines the relationship between violent conflict and the crisis of representation in an African country by focusing on political parties and rebel movements. It deals with the “chicken or the egg” question of whether inadequate representation leads to violent conflict or whether violent conflict damages representative democracy. Political parties are assumed to represent social interests; in the context of the plural society of the Central African Republic (CAR) these are mainly ethnoregional interests. As will be shown, political parties have not performed well in their representative role, for a number of reasons (from objective obstacles such as organizational shortcomings and lack of means of communication to rent-seeking behavior). Numerous rebel movements claim to put local and national grievances on the agenda; they are heard and therefore seem to address these issues better than parties. Parties and rebel movements therefore compete to a certain extent, but political parties lose out in the course of war and in peace processes, not least because they are no longer regarded as the main actors by international mediators.

The relationship between political parties and violence can be complex, particularly when violence has become an established mode of competition, as is the case in many African states. More importantly, civilian political parties can fall prey to armed insurgencies in an indirect but significant way: They are simply no longer the most important actors in the political game when peace negotiations involve the government on the one hand and rebel movements on the other. Political parties also have to position themselves between alignment and critique with respect to violent actors—a potentially risky business. They may ultimately lose out as a result of power-sharing arrangements enacted in peace agreements. In such processes they usually receive substantially less attention from the media and the donor community present in the country than most armed movements do (Mehler 2009). Moreover, the difficulties of political parties in representing supposedly ethnoregional interests are aggravated by rebel movements which appeal to the same clientele. Formerly violent actors, the warlords and rebel movements, may turn their organizations into political parties and compete in future elections—it cannot be ignored that they are often more successful than their peaceful competitors at the polls. In the end, political parties become marginalized. Violence pays; democracy is harmed. By focusing differently on civilian political parties—that is, on their role in conflict and their (in)capacity to represent ethnoregional interests, contrary to general assumptions—and on rebel movements—that is, on their ability to sideline civilian competitors instead of the difficulty of transforming them into political parties (“from bullets to ballots”)—this paper seeks to address questions that escape the attention of well-intentioned policy makers and mainstream research alike.

Methodologically, the paper addresses its hypotheses in the following way: The main (north/south) ethnoregional cleavages, together with further types, are described and analyzed in relation to the changing election results from 1993 to 2005. The limited responsiveness of the political system to ethnoregional grievances is shown through the demonstration of the limited amount of public goods provided in the periphery. The supposed social and political basis of rebel movements is contrasted with their clearly opportunistic rent-seeking behavior. Behavioral patterns of opposition parties towards the use of violence are also analyzed. By analyzing the composition and dramaturgy of peace processes (international negotiations including power-sharing devices plus internal dialogue processes), the paper demonstrates the declining importance of political parties in the political game. Finally, selected biographical data shows that some of the key stakeholders in CAR politics are straddling roles as violent entrepreneurs and as civilian politicians and thereby setting problematic standards for political careers. As a result both peace and democracy have suffered enormously over the last two decades.

There is a growing body of literature on the transition from rebel movements to political parties (e.g., De Zeeuw 2008, Dudouet 2009, Deonandan/Close/Prevost 2007, Kovacs Söderbergh 2008), but relatively little is said about the fate or strategies of “ordinary,” “civilian” parties in that context. Some works specifically focus on the challenges of post-conflict elections (Lyons 2005) or of power sharing (Sriram 2008, Jarstad 2008, Mehler 2009), but most focus on the general transition to peace. The focus of the Jarstad/Sisk (2008) volume is fortunately about “war to democracy transitions.” Its contributions show that policy makers’ expectations that those transitions result more or less automatically in both peace and democracy are highly problematic and naive. Manning (2004, 2007) is interested in the description of challenges that parties themselves face in moving from battlefield to political arena. She finds (2007: 268) that intense competition forces parties to adapt but does not necessarily make them more moderate, more institutionalized internally, or more committed to democratic competition. In the following pages the interest is not so much the organizational problems of parties—particularly violent ones—during transition, but rather their representational function and their changing attitudes towards violent conflict.

Political parties ideally represent social interests. The latter may be in conflict, and sometimes this conflict degenerates into violent conflict. Sartori posits that parties are or should be “an instrument [...] for representing the people by expressing their demands” (Sartori 1976: 27). Different forms or degrees of representation may be distinguished, and the symbolic/descriptive and responsive/substantive ends of a continuum may be juxtaposed. In the African context, it is assumed that the predominant division of social interests is frequently ethno-regional in nature, although doubts are permitted, particularly with regard to the assumed link between ethnicity and party politics (Basedau/Stroh 2009).¹ Ethno-regional groups certainly do not exist “objectively” and with a clear consciousness on their own. “Rather both groups and their interests are to an extent constituted through the political process itself” (Randall 2007: 84). Randall—in an initial sketch of the representational function of political parties in Africa (2007: 101)—comes to the conclusion that African political parties in general may offer some degree of descriptive representation [...] for ethnic groups [...] but that evidence of more substantive, responsive representation of these social groups [...] is much harder to find. Whilst (some) ethnic groups may appear to enjoy a form of substantive or interest representation, through the processes of clientelism, in reality it may be closer to symbolic collective representation.

¹ Randall (2007: 90) opts for ethno-regional instead of just ethnic interests: “In fact numerous studies of recent elections in tropical Africa, given the frequent tendency for concentrations of particular ethnic groups to coincide with administrative region boundaries, refer to “ethno-regional” identities (for instance Nugent on Ghana, 2001). However, supposing that ethnicity and regionalism are distinct bases of political identity and behavior, then in studies of some national elections the suggestion is made that what looks like or is described as ethnically-based voting is really regionalism.”

The question, then, is whether armed insurgencies are more able to represent ethno-regional interests than political parties.

This contribution addresses these more general points by focusing on the exemplary case of the CAR since the mid-1990s. The country experienced a fairly successful democratic transition in the early 1990s but is one of the African cases where a mixture of basic state fragility and mismanagement led to widespread violence only few years later (similar to Burundi and Congo-Brazzaville, where the democratic experience was even more short-lived). The case is also an example of a “democracy to warlord politics transition,” as will be shown. This contribution (a) looks systematically for indicators of the decline in the political importance of parties in times of mutiny, civil war, and rebellion and (b) puts them in the context of two main characteristics of contemporary history: a problematic elite attitude towards (political) violence and the dynamics of peace processes, including their unintended consequences. Therefore, the general relationship between political parties and violent conflicts is characterized before a closer look is taken at the peace process (or the various peace processes) and the changing role of political parties in it. In conclusion, the paper assesses whether there is competition over the representation of ethno-regional interests between political parties and armed insurgencies.

2 Parties and Cleavages, Conflict and Violence in the CAR

Conflicts are often first and foremost nonviolent conflicts. Societal cleavages are seen as essential for the shaping of a party system, and this is also assumed to hold true for African countries. However, the classical European cleavages along the axes of church versus state, labor versus capital, urban versus rural areas, center versus periphery are only partially relevant (Erdmann 2007).

2.1 Ethno-regional Cleavages in the CAR’s Political System

For a long time, up to the end of the 1980s, the most relevant cleavage in the CAR was more or less an ethno-regional one with a clear north-south divide (or savanners versus riverains, see Table 2). The main political personalities of the country—Barthélémy Boganda, Jean-Bédél Bokassa and David Dacko—were south-western (of the comparatively small Ngbaka ethnic group); Abel Goumba (Banziri) and André Kolingba (Yakoma) were south-central elites. The densely populated north-west (Gbaya, Sara, and also Mandja) felt neglected, and Ange-Félix Patassé, an ambitious up and coming politician and prime minister under Bokassa from 1976 to 1978 built on this grievance, though he made his career in Bangui. The capital, the bulk of formal educational institutions, health centers, etc. were all located in the south.

Change did occur in the 1990s, but initially not in terms of the general north-south divide. In fact, election results from the 1990s (1993 and 1998/99) show a remarkable similarity concerning the outcome for the ruling party, Mouvement pour la Libération du Peuple Centrafricain (MLPC; founded in 1982 and for a long time dominated by Patassé). It received 40–50 percent of the votes each time, something which could be explained by the existence of a rather stable ethnoregional alliance (mainly Sara and Gbaya) in the north-west and the north (Table 1).

Table 1: Legislative Elections since 1993 / Seats per Party

	1993 (of 85 seats)	1998 (of 109 seats)	2005 (of 105 seats)
MLPC	34	47	11
RDC	13	20	8
FPP	7	7	2
PSD	3	6	5
ADP	6	5	2
MDD	6	8	(2)
PLD	7	2	(3)
CN	3	-	-
MESAN	1	-	-
MDREC	1	-	-
PRC	1	-	-
FC	1	1	-
PUN	-	3	(3)
FODEM	-	2	(1)
UPR	-	1	-
KNK (platform of smaller parties)	-	-	42
Löndö	-	-	1
Independent	2	7	34

Sources: African Elections Database <http://africanelections.tripod.com/cf.html> (accessed 24 September 2009); other sources provide partly differing information. The results of established parties that joined the KNK platform (MDD, PLD, PUN, FODEM) are detailed in the table (in brackets).

In fact, both Patassé and Goumba, Patassé's challenger in the second round of the 1993 presidential elections, had clear regional strongholds, with Patassé winning more than 85 percent in three out of 17 prefectures (north-west: Ouham, Ouham-Pendé and Nana-Gribizi) and Goumba equally 85 percent in four, less densely populated prefectures (south-east: Ouaka, Basse-Kotto, Mbomou and Haut-Mbomou).² This ethnoregional voting pattern should not be mistaken as evidence of an inability on the part of citizens to change the regime by electoral means (and therefore a pretext for violence) as Patassé always needed smaller alliance partners to get a majority. The former single party, created by Kolingba in 1986, the Rassemble-

² In the legislative elections the FPP did not field any candidates in Ouham-Pende (four electoral districts); the MLPC likewise fielded only a single candidate in one out of 5 districts in Mbomou. The RDC and the MLPC, with 83 and 77 candidates (out of 85), were clearly aiming high and wide, followed by the FPP (58), the ADP (54) and the PSD (39). The distribution of PSD candidates does not show any clear territorial pattern. Source: Calculations based on information obtained by the author at the Mixed Independent Electoral Commission (CEMI), Bangui 1993.

ment Démocratique Centrafricain (RDC) was too weak to win multiparty elections but strong enough to persist as the major opposition party. It won its seats mostly in the southern and south-eastern parts of the country. Kolingba's own ethnic group, the Yakoma, was the main ethnic group supporting the party, but the Yakoma vote alone would not have been enough to win the amount of seats the RDC actually won. In fact, there were other notable dynamics in the political geography during the 1990s, for example, the declining popularity of the "fourth" candidate Goumba and his Front Patriotique pour le Progrès (FPP), a party with deep political roots but without a continued organizational existence.³ The RDC clearly profited from the declining popularity of the Goumba camp after the 1993 elections. Other shifting alliances in the southern block were also observed (Mehler 2005). Thus, only the MLPC and the RDC can be termed stable political parties.

It appears as if it was initially not necessary to compete for the votes of ethnic parties' "core" voters. Nevertheless, at the margins of each party's electorate there was intense nonviolent competition. The parties or their leaders probably held some clientelist appeal among their followers, although Goumba in particular never wanted to appear as the typical African "big man." In Randall's terms (2007: 90) even the bigger parties MLPC and RDC could still be seen as representing ethnoregional interests "to the extent that parties are identified by their leaders and/or in the public mind with one or more ethnic groups," while it was also appropriate to ask "in what sense are they representing those groups"? (emphasis in the original). The FPP and, arguably, three other parties (ADP, PSD, MDD), with their long-lasting existence and ability to win mandates, may be seen as additional parties of significant importance that merit attention for the sake of the argument of this contribution.

The "Northern Alliance" was probably terminally ended by Bozizé's (of Gbaya origin) revolt against his former mentor Patassé (from the Suma minority, but usually identified with Sara)⁴ and the subsequent armed takeover of state power in 2002/03. Both Gbaya and Sara are major ethnic groups in the north/north-west of the country, and they believed that they had experienced neglect since the beginning of French colonization.⁵ Patassé's military defeat by Bozizé meant that the old ethnoregional cleavage (north versus south) had lost relevance, something which will be demonstrated in a later section.

The relative neglect of the north was obviously not remedied when northern politicians started to rule the country (beginning with Patassé in 1993). This becomes clear when the provision of public goods since the 1990s is examined. In terms of both critical infrastructure (roads, hospitals, schools) and security, no significant progress was recorded in the periphery.⁶ A certain “Patassé effect” may be seen by comparing the net school enrollment rates in 1988, 2000 and 2003 by region: Ouham and Ouham-Pendé, the major Patassé strongholds, witnessed an increase from 29.4 and 31.5 percent, respectively, to 37.4 and 36.0 percent between 1988 and 2000, with falling figures in 2003 (UNDP 2008: 146). However, Patassé’s home region of Ouham-Pendé was in 2006 still the prefecture with the second-highest ranking (out of 17) with regard to respondents claiming to have no education and only thirteenth place with regard to respondents claiming to have secondary education or higher (UNFPA/Macro International 2008: 4, 5). It might also be of interest that Vakaga Prefecture, the main site of the Union des Forces Démocratiques pour le Rassemblement (UFDR) rebellion starting in 2005, had the worst, and still declining figures, for school enrollment rates (1988: 26.8, 2000: 22.4, 2003: 22.0) (UNDP 2008: 146). The record was not better with regard to security as a public good in Northern CAR. Insecurity indeed even spread under both Patassé and Bozizé in large parts of the periphery, and not only in Bangui, which had been the main theatre of violence in 1996/97. With few exceptions, most probably in the elite, northern populations did not profit from northern government.

³ Research on political parties in the CAR is very limited. Useful information can be found in Bradshaw 2009. The report by UNDP 2008: 44-51, offers some very general insights into the depressing material situation and low general esteem of political parties.

⁴ The Suma are a Gbaya subgroup. I would like to thank Richard Bradshaw for making me aware of this often neglected aspect.

⁵ It would be hazardous to display any concrete ethnic census figures, but the following groups are usually seen as being most important: Banda, Gbaya, Sara/Mboum, Mandja, Ngbaka, Haoussa, Ngbandi, Zandé-Nzakara, Mbororo. Some subgroups, such as the Yakoma (a subgroup of the Ngbandi), have gained extraordinary prominence. Background information on some groups in Kalck 2005.

2.2 Growing Fragmentation

The MLPC thus did not “deliver” to its main constituencies, but it was not the only party to experience setbacks. The degree of fragmentation of the party system has been increasing since 1993 (see Table 1). This has served as an initial indicator of a loss of influence on the part of the main political parties. Whereas the RDC and the MLPC together controlled 47 out of 85 seats after the 1993 elections (55.3 percent) and the six most important parties controlled 59 seats (69.4 percent), this ratio changed with the 1998 elections: 67 out of 109 for MLPC and RDC combined (61.4 percent) and 88 seats for the six important parties (80.7 percent). Thus, the first sign of the loss of importance of formal political parties appeared with this election. Seven independent candidates were elected, as compared with two in the previous election. A big change in the legislative composition occurred only after the successful Bozizé rebellion in 2003. After the 2005 elections, the MLPC and the RDC together held only 19 out of 105 seats (18.1 percent) and the six important parties together held 29 seats (27.6 percent). This result reflects a dramatic political change, though there was admittedly no level playing field during these elections. Can this development be termed a crisis of ethnoregional representation? Or was it just a matter of unfair elections? Probably not the latter: The elections were not openly manipulated, at least not on a countrywide level. Even more significant than the loss of seats for major parties was the increase in the number of independent candidates elected: 34 members of parliament were elected as independents. These figures could be taken as clear evidence of the declining importance of political parties in an era of growing violence. However, political parties have themselves been part of this evolution (see Table 2).⁷

⁶ The mortality rate for children under age five in Region 3 (Ouham and Ouham-Pendé, Patassé’s stronghold) remained among the highest in the CAR (284/1000 against a national average of 220), see UNDP 2008: 155. The region was better equipped with health centers in 2003 than others though (ibid.: 156). According to official figures, the prefecture with the poorest schoolchildren/teacher ratio is Lobaye, where Bokassa, Boganda and Dacko are from.

Table 2: Political Parties and Conflict in the CAR

Main (and secondary) cleavages at the national level	North–South
Parties representing ethnoregional interests	5 out of 6 main parties (exception: PSD)
Polarization of the party system	Multipolar, very high
Transition to multiparty democracy	Rather early: 1993 Perverted: 1995
Level of violence exerted by individual political parties	Moderate, rather indirectly: RDC / Kolingba; indirect, but obvious: Patassé (and not the entire MLPC)

Source: Author's compilation.

2.3 Party-related Violence

The CAR's transitional context is obviously important for understanding party-related violence. The CAR is an example of a transition that was perverted by the undemocratic behavior of democratically elected rulers (similar to Congo-Brazzaville). President Patassé's governance style included widespread mismanagement, self-enrichment, the buying of MPs and the exclusion of formerly privileged groups. These activities formed the background for mutinies (1996/97), coup attempts (2001/02) and the successful rebellion (2003). Patassé had created his own personal armed groups (Karako militia and others), but they were not formally related to the MLPC. This party, founded in the 1980s, was in fact solidly anchored in society and different currents existed within it, some of which were critical of Patassé. It would be wrong to assume that the MLPC was an instrument in the grip of its chairman Patassé (Bradshaw 2008: 108). There is no doubt that at least Patassé himself showed a propensity to use violence when it suited his personal interests, while the MLPC may not have been directly associated.

Long-standing relationships between elites in the party and in the security apparatus are not simply cut off when ruling parties lose elections. In the CAR the former ruling party, RDC—Kolingba's party—retained considerable influence in the security apparatus, particularly in the army, throughout the 1990s. The RDC did not play in accordance with the rules of democracy either. Similarly to other parties, it became a secondary actor in the course of the growing militarization of politics, which occurred from the mid-1990s on. The mutinies in the late 1990s and the attempted violent coup in 2001 evoked more than mere sympathy from the RDC, although—and this is important—the party never endorsed Kolingba’s personal decision to back the coup. Ethnic loyalty played a role in mutinies and the coup attempt as well, as former president Kolingba had predominantly recruited troops from his Yakoma ethnic group. The resulting backlash on the RDC was evident as well when the coup attempt failed.⁸

7. Differences in the reported election results are mostly due to Bozizé's nebulous support base. He relied, on the one hand, on a handful of new political parties and independent candidates together forming the alliance Kwa Na Kwa (KNK, literally "work and work") and, on the other hand, on some established parties which lent their support, for a short time only, to the new head of state for opportunistic reasons.

Electoral competition itself was not exempt from violence in the CAR’s multiparty era, but compared to other African cases, this violence resulted in limited damage. However, both of the major parties did not completely reject violence as a means of politics, at least not clearly enough.

3 Peace Negotiations and Imperfect Dialogue Processes

3.1 The First Peace Process

International actors also exerted an influence in the interplay between civilian and armed actors in the CAR. Pushed by France, four African presidents flew in directly from the Franco-African summit in Ouagadougou in early December 1996, and some of them again in January 1997, to mediate between the mutineers and the government (Ngoupandé 1997: 78-81). The efforts by Konaré, Bongo, Déby, and Compaoré led to the signing of the Bangui Peace Accord on January 25, 1997. On April 7, Mali’s ex-president and chief mediator Amadou Toumani Touré brokered the entry of two of the mutineers into an enlarged government. In contrast to their sidelining in peace talks from 2006 onwards, 25 political parties, the five main trade unions, and 12 civil society organizations signed a declaration that was then made part of the peace accord. The first post-agreement government instated in February was made up of approximately 50 percent opposition and 50 percent pro-president forces. Reconciliation talks were held in Bangui in February and March 1998 with approximately 400 participants; the opposition alliance G-11 took part, and although it suspended its participation for some days for procedural reasons, a national reconciliation pact was still signed at the end of the meeting. This was the last time that political parties played such an important role in the peace process.

It is essential to recognize that the armed conflicts in 1996/97—and equally importantly, the character of their resolution—had certain highly negative effects on the political climate in the country: effects that undermined the prospects for both democracy and the preservation of civil peace. Furthermore, the activities of international actors—despite good intentions—effectively contributed to the poisoning of the political environment.

⁸ The minister of the interior suspended inter alia the activities of the party for several months.

In the first place, the character of the conflict-settlement process, as promoted by international actors, amplified the tension between the principle of accommodation and the practice of exclusionary and privatized politics. International actors continuously asked for broader representation of the radical and partly violent opposition, and later rebels, in government. And at some point, something close to this objective was achieved: the mutinies of 1996/97 led to the inclusion of some rebel leaders in roles entailing governmental responsibility, as we have seen. Patassé also felt compelled to include a rather substantial number of opposition members in his government, but he was able to handpick which members would be included and which portfolios they obtained. In parallel he appointed more and more advisors, who formed a kind of a shadow cabinet where the real decisions were taken.

Thus, what appears to have occurred with this first conflict-settlement episode was a temporary and cosmetic acceptance of inclusive politics, largely as a result of international pressure. The practice of inclusion did not, however, lead to any real participation in the decision-making process by former counter-elites. Even less so was it perceived to have led to an equal representation of ethnoregional interests. In practice, the agreement involved more of an extension of rents to those elites with the power to disrupt civil peace. That the National Assembly later decided to attribute substantial pensions to former presidents Dacko and Kolingba (October 30, 1997) testifies to this. Such pensions were clearly a bonus for the renunciation of violence.

A dangerous precedent was established in the resolution of these conflicts. A lesson apparently learnt by local actors was that the threat of violence could be instrumentalized to receive material rewards. For instance, the mutineers were immediately accepted as a negotiation partner and concessions were made quickly—much more quickly than to the civilian opposition. Exerting violence proved to be a means to garner international attention, which, at least at first glance, proved rewarding. One message emanating from this situation was that those losing out in the redistribution of sinecures should retain their capacity to sustain conflict (inter alia arms). This would preserve their capacity to come back to the “dining room.”⁹

Additionally, it is important to state that electoral violence in the CAR was constantly comparatively low. Campaigns resulted only in a very limited number of casualties in 1993, 1998/99 and 2005. When the situation in the CAR is compared to, for instance, Kenya or Côte d’Ivoire it becomes obvious that the CAR’s political parties were not deeply involved in acts of violence. A qualified exception is the avowed involvement of former president Kolingba in the bloody coup attempt in May 2001, but again it is doubtful whether his RDC was involved: the party never formally endorsed its leader's decision.

⁹ The CAR example is in line with Bratton and van de Walle’s (1997: 269) argument that a transition from neopatrimonial rule is prone to a violent end because of the tendency of the new democratically elected president to distribute according to a neopatrimonial logic, but this time not to the same circle of persons.

3.2 From Patassé to Bozizé

In the aftermath of the May 2001 uprising, parallel investigations created an atmosphere of general suspicion. The dismissal and later accusation of the chief of staff, General François Bozizé, of being implicated in a new coup plan was a surprising turn of events. Bozizé refused to accept an arrest warrant. On November 3, 2001, the UN Secretary General's special representative in the CAR, General Lamine Cissé, undertook a good offices mission to bring the two parties together. On the basis of unwritten concessions by both parties, President Patassé promised to appoint Bozizé to another post and to consider granting a pardon once the judicial procedure was completed. For his part, Bozizé seemed to be willing to be questioned by the Commission of Inquiry. However, four days later government troops attacked Bozizé's positions.¹⁰ Bozizé now defected with approximately 100 troops and moved to the north of the country. After taking weapons from several gendarmerie barracks and following a number of skirmishes, Bozizé went into exile in Chad. His troops returned to Bangui in a surprise attack on October 25, 2002. They were repulsed after heavy fighting with Patassé's forces, which included Libyan troops and up to 1,000 fighters from the Congolese rebel organization Mouvement de Libération du Congo (MLC) (Marchal 2009).

In this context, Patassé offered a "national dialogue without exclusion" on New Year's Eve, but he only gradually received support for the idea. Political parties in fact had a difficult choice to make in these days: siding with the republic and accepting dialogue meant siding with a president who did not show respect for democracy (or the constitution); siding with Bozizé—which many parties ultimately did—meant siding with a violent actor of doubtful democratic credentials. Getting rid of Patassé at any price was apparently the order of the day.

Patassé seemed completely isolated, the country devastated, and democracy in shambles when another surprise attack by Bozizé's troops (helped by Chad) led to the downfall of Bangui on March 15, 2003. Patassé was at a regional summit in Niger. Upon his return he could not land, was forced to fly to Cameroon, and finally took exile in Togo. Bozizé suspended the constitution and named a new cabinet including most opposition parties and with Goumba as vice president. A National Transitional Council (CNT) was introduced as an all-party body to serve as the interim legislative organization. The postponed "national dialogue," originally planned by Patassé for December 2002, was held from September 15 to October 27, 2003 and resulted in a sober assessment of the country's situation. Despite numerous statements of forgiveness and reconciliation, the climate of distrust remained.

¹⁰ See the report of the UN Secretary General to the UN Security Council, S/2002/12, 2 January 2002.

The “national dialogue”—which included many of the major civilian protagonists but not Patassé or his former minister of defense Jean-Jacques Démafouth—in September/October 2003 can still be termed fairly successful as it led to a set of consensus decisions regarding major fields of public life (particularly on the electoral process).¹¹ At the beginning of the proceedings a resolution had been tabled to bar all members of the transitional government, including the head of state, from standing for election. This was quickly foiled by the president’s camp, showing that Bozizé had long-term ambitions.¹² Bozizé was eventually elected president in 2005. He included some heavyweights of the political class in his subsequent government, including one of Kolingba’s sons, but he excluded the Patassé camp. Patassé himself had been excluded from standing in the presidential elections.

The accession to power of yet another military leader exposed a major pattern in the CAR’s political life, with the political careers of some main figures demonstrating the straddling of two spheres of power, one civilian, one military:

- Ange-Félix Patassé (MLPC): putschist, 1982; president, 1993–2003; afterwards at least vaguely associated with some northern rebel movements (Armée populaire pour la restauration de la démocratie—APRD, Front Démocratique du Peuple Centrafricain—FDPC).
- François Bozizé (KNK): putschist, 1982 and 2003; very disappointing election results in 1993 (1.5 percent); chief of staff, 2001; president of the republic, 2003.
- André Kolingba (RDC): chief of staff, 1979; putschist, 1981; president of the republic, 1981–1993; at least indirectly involved in mutinies, 1996/97; claimed to be the mastermind of the coup attempt in 2001.
- Charles Massi (FODEM): retired army colonel; former mines minister under Patassé; minister of rural development under Bozizé; political coordinator of the UFDC rebel movement in 2008 (later expelled); and founder of the armed Convention des patriotes pour la justice et la paix (CPJP).
- Jean-Jacques Démafouth (NAP): defense minister under Patassé; interrogated for involvement in a coup attempt, 2001; political brain behind the APRD rebellion; in 2009 vice president of a UNDP-sponsored demobilization program.¹³

¹¹ A truth and reconciliation commission was, however, never established, although one of the final recommendations asked for it.

¹² Le Nouvel Afrique Asie, 170, Novembre 2003, p. 22. See also Le Nouvel Afrique Asie, 171, Décembre 2003, pp. 16-17.

¹³ The Economist Intelligence Unit (CAR report, March 2009) notes that Demafouth’s appointment was denounced by the rival MLJC, which has been excluded from the government and various implementation committees.

3.3 Rebellion and a New Peace Process

The exclusion of Patassé from the elections in 2005 triggered a rebellion in his home region. Additionally, so-called “liberators,” partly Chadian mercenaries and partly CAR nationals who had helped Bozizé take power (Debos 2007), increasingly posed a security threat in the capital Bangui and extorted money from inhabitants. They were later transported to the border with the help of the Chadian government, and a good number of them became rebel fighters. This variation in the origin of the different new rebel groups may already indicate whether they could be expected to represent larger group interests.

The various rebel movements in the northern part of the country from 2005 onwards were also dealt with diplomatically after they could not be defeated by the regime. While the UFDR rebels asked for negotiations under international mediation, Bozizé was more than reluctant. The only noteworthy signal was when the head of state held a one-day forum in the National Assembly as a limited form of dialogue with all “vibrant parts of the society,” during which he at least did not rule out direct talks with rebels. Several opposition leaders snubbed the meeting. While France intervened with massive military support for the Bozizé government, most international donors continued to exert pressure on Bozizé to start negotiations with the rebels. Bozizé gave in by announcing a direct dialogue in his New Year’s speech in 2006.

Talks were started under the aegis of Libya. Bozizé met Abdoulaye Miskine, a dreaded warlord once on the pay roll of Patassé, on January 25, 2007. The so-called Agreement of Syrte was agreed upon after an extremely short series of meetings between the two (January 29–31, 2007). In early February 2007, Miskine, believed to still be close to former president Patassé, returned to Bangui and was offered the position of advisor to the president (which he later declined). He was said to have links to practically all operating rebel movements, particularly the FDPC but also the UFDR. The content of the January peace agreement was limited, but it included an immediate ceasefire. A vague reference was made to “the participation of FDPC and UFDR in the management of state affairs, in a spirit of reconciliation and in conformity with the Constitution.”¹⁴ The UFDR commanders and others distanced themselves from the treaty, and new attacks on Birao were launched. The French army had to intervene again. A separate peace agreement with the UFDR was signed on April 13 (see Table 3).¹⁵

On April 24, 2007, the APRD, which was close to Patassé, attacked an army convoy. Shortly before the attack, the army had conducted one of its infamous raids in the north-west of the country. The APRD, which was initially excluded from the peace process, had continued to fight (maybe for this reason) and to appeal for an inclusive dialogue.¹⁶ A preparatory committee to organize the inclusive national dialogue was agreed upon in October 2007, with rebels holding only three of 23 positions.

¹⁴ The text of the Syrte Agreement is available at <http://alliance-democratie-progres.over-blog.com/article-5637289.html> (accessed 3 August 2009)

¹⁵ The text of the Birao Agreement is available at http://www.sangonet.com/afriqg/PAFF/Dic/actuC/ActuC6/acord_birao_gouv-ufdr.html (accessed 3 August 2009). The agreement was only signed by the military commander Zaccharia Damane and not by the formal leaders, who were under house arrest in Benin.

Both the APRD and the government finally signed a ceasefire agreement on May 9, 2008, thus preparing the ground for a more inclusive peace agreement. Interestingly, some well-known politicians jumped on the bandwagon rather late in the process—or revealed their intimate connection with various rebel movements. On March 29, 2008, the former defense minister Démafouth, who had for a long time been believed to have close links with “the” rebellion, was declared coordinator of the APRD. He had once been one of ex-president Patassé’s closest confidants, but had then been dismissed and arrested in 2001 in the context of the failed coup. The move to make Charles Massi political coordinator of the UFDR came as a surprise. Massi, a retired army colonel, had been among the most active political entrepreneurs during the previous decade¹⁷ and headed a small political party (Forum Démocratique pour la Modernité, FODEM). He had supported, then opposed, the Patassé regime as well as that of Bozizé and had held several ministerial positions, most recently as minister of rural development until mid-January 2008. Both Massi and Démafouth had stood for president in the past and had received rather disappointing results (3.2 and 1.3 percent respectively in the 2005 presidential election). The conclusion they seemed to draw from this experience was that they could never win elections without taking up arms first. This was exactly the lesson demonstrated by Bozizé, who had received a meager result in the 1993 elections.

After many steps back and forth, a so-called “global” peace agreement was signed in Libreville on June 21 by the government, the APRD (Démafouth), and the UFDR (local military commander Damane). It was rejected by parts of the exiled UFDR leadership, however, and was not signed by the third most important group, the FDPC, even though it had attended the meeting. Fighting erupted anew in August after all three groups withdrew from the peace process over the thorny issue of an amnesty law.

Gabon’s President Bongo invited the belligerent parties to Libreville in September following the new skirmishes to save the global peace agreement. The National Assembly finally approved the amnesty law in late September with 72 votes in favor and one abstention; 31 opposition members boycotted the vote because they rejected some last-minute changes to the text. The new law granted amnesty to both government and rebel forces for crimes committed since January 1999. This was crucial for Démafouth, who was charged with the murder of five people close to former president Kolingba back in 1999. The law specifically named ¹⁶ Press statement of 10 November 2007, available at <http://www.centrAfrique.com/aprdetledialogue.pdf> (accessed 3 August 2009).

¹⁷ In March 2002 he had created the exiled opposition alliance Front pour la restauration de l’unité nationale et de la démocratie (FRUD) with former mutineer Isidore Dokodo. At that time he admitted sympathizing with both armed movements against Patassé, that is, Kolingba’s failed coup and Bozizé’s rebellion.

Patassé, Démafouth and FDPC leader Miskine. This was presented as the only realistic option for peace but came with a number of problems. First of all, Patassé—in exile in Togo—had been sentenced in absentia in 2006 to 20 years of forced labor for economic crimes, and the International Criminal Court was investigating him for crimes against humanity.¹⁸

Table 3: Power-sharing Elements of Peace Agreements in the CAR

Peace Agreements	Participants	Power-sharing Details	Role of Political Parties
Bangui, January 25, 1997	Mutiny leader Saulet, President Patassé, Gabon's President Bongo, Chad's President Déby	Political : Prime minister with expanded authority, grand coalition with representation of the opposition, suspension of the legal pursuit of politicians close to the mutiny Military : Amnesty for mutineers	Separate agreement (accord préalable à un pact de réconciliation nationale ¹⁹) involving all the main political parties (25 in total). Clear role in the running of public affairs: 11 members of the opposition, and later two representatives of the armed rebels, enter the government
Syrte (Libya), February 2, 2007 ^h	Warlord Abdoulaye Miskine and ex-minister André Ringui de Gaillard for FDPC and UFDR, Justice Minister Otto for government	Political : Participation of rebel movements in the "management of state affairs" (vague) Military : Integration of rebel fighters into the national army	None
Birao, April 13, 2007 ⁱ	Prefect, Damane as local commander of the UFDR	Political : Participation of UFDR in the "management of state affairs" (vague) Military : Integration of rebel fighters into the national army	None
Libreville (Gabon), June 21, 2008	APRD, UFDR, government, MLCJ and UFR; ²⁰ the FDPC also ultimately joined the agreement	Political : Amnesty provisions Military : Disarmament and Demobilisation and Reintegration (DDR) program followed by integration of rebel fighters into the national army	None

Source: Author's compilation.

It is essential to acknowledge that political parties gradually lost their significance in the peace process with every major episode of violence (see Table 2).

¹⁸ The law specified that it excluded genocide, crimes against humanity, and war crimes as well as all acts under the jurisdiction of the ICC. Jean-Pierre Bemba, once DR Congo's vice president and before that rebel leader, had been arrested in May 2008 near Brussels precisely for his role in crimes against humanity perpetrated by his troops in the CAR when they fought alongside Patassé's army in 2002–2003, see also Glasius 2008.

¹⁹ Text reprinted in Afrique Express 133, 20 January 1997, p.8.

²⁰ l'Union des forces républicaines, a smaller rebel movement headed by Lt. Florian Njadder.

3.4 Dialogue Again, but Differently

One of the original UFDR factions, Abakar Sabone's Mouvement des Libérateurs Centrafricains pour la Justice (MLCJ), which had left the UFDR, joined the Libreville peace agreement only on December 7, 2008. By its military strength, this was certainly not the most important rebel movement; content-wise, however, it was probably the most outspoken one.

The beginning of the so-called "inclusive political dialogue" followed this last signature. The preparatory committee had presented its final report to Bozizé in April after two months of negotiations between government representatives and the three main rebel movements. The recommendations had detailed the composition of delegates and the venue, but it took several more months for concrete preparations to begin. In late October 2008 the APRD, the UFDR, and the government had held talks in Libreville which resulted in a new composition of the preparatory committee, with the opposition coalition Union des Forces Vives de la Nation (UFVN)²¹, civil society organizations, and the rebel groups receiving more seats. This at last paved the way for the holding of this important gathering of approximately 200 participants from December 8 to 20 in Bangui.

The meeting was chaired by former Burundian president (and coup leader) Pierre Buyoya. Patassé flew in from his exile in Togo. His rival inside the MLPC, Martin Ziguélé, attended as well, as did Démafourth, who had formed a political party in the meantime (Nouvelle Alliance pour le Progrès, NAP). During the opening ceremony, the civilian opposition were not allowed to take the floor. On December 10, UFVN coordinator Henri Pouzère asked Bozizé to step down for multiple violations of the constitution,²² but the tide turned when Ziguélé, whose MLPC was part of the UFVN, explicitly recognized Bozizé as president four days later. Towards the end of the gathering Patassé joined this position. Warlord Miskine, absent at the beginning, participated at least for the last day. In the end, the participants and most importantly Bozizé agreed to form an inclusive consensus government, hold free and transparent elections, install a follow-up committee, and create a truth and reconciliation commission. The follow-up committee was composed of former presidents Patassé and Kolingba, plus Bozizé. There were no seats for the civilian or the armed opposition.²³ Not only in formal peace agreements but also in dialogue processes, the civilian opposition had lost out (Table 4).

²¹ Most of the time including the MLPC and the RDC as heavyweights and the ADP as a secondary force. Chairmanship was given to Henri Pouzère, leader of the Association Löndö and member of parliament, who had formerly been a very outspoken civil society representative. According to Bradshaw (2008), the UFVN had 19 seats in parliament.

²² Pouzère wanted to transform the inclusive political dialogue into a sort of "national sovereign conference." He also asked Bozizé to explain the reasons for his rebellions in 2002 and 2003. In this way, he questioned the existence and the legitimacy of any armed pursuit of political interests. See Agence Centrafricaine de Presse, 10 December 2008. His statements were apparently shocking to most participants at the meeting.

²³ Xinhua, 21 December 2008.

Table 4: Political Dialogue Forums in the CAR

Dialogue Forum	Participants from the Civilian Opposition	Participants from Armed Movements	Results
February/March 1998 (approximately 400 participants)	28 political parties, among them the opposition group G-11	Not mentioned (did not sign the final document)	National reconciliation pact (rather vague)
September 2003: National Dialogue (approximately 350 participants)	Nearly the entire political class of the country, but Patassé banned from participation	None (armed forces represented)	Solemn declaration underlining the indivisibility of the nation and making ethnic hatred a "crime against the nation." List of key recommendations, inter alia on the order of municipal, legislative and presidential elections to be held in 2005. National Transitional Council later rejects government's application of the results.
December 2008: Inclusive Political Dialogue (approximately 200 participants—officially 128)	15 (plus 7 for "other parties"), among them Henri Pouzère (UFVN), André Kolingba (RDR), Martin Ziguélé (MLPC)	17, among them Jean-Jacques Demafouth (APRD), Damane Zakaria (UFDR), Abakar Sabone (MLCJ), Abdoulaye Miskine (FDPC) (he joined the talks only on the last day)	A list of key recommendations: the appointment of a consensus government; the holding of free and fair municipal (2009), legislative and presidential elections (2010); the creation of a truth and reconciliation commission; the launching of a DDR program; the auditing of several economic sectors; creation of a follow-up committee.

Source: Author's compilation, based on various sources (Sangonet, Marchés Tropicaux et Méditerranéens and others).

The consensus government was eventually formed on January 19, 2009, but offered only limited opportunities for participation to civilian opposition and rebel movements. Three opposition members, Moïse Kotaye, André Nalke Dorogo (MLPC), and Raymond Adouma were appointed to the junior ministries of small and medium-sized enterprises, public health and international cooperation, respectively. Françoise Naoyama of the APRD became the environment minister, and Djomo Didou of the UFDR the housing minister. New rebel alliances were subsequently formed, and new skirmishes took place in the first half of 2009. At the time of writing, it appears premature to believe in the success of the peace process.

4 Representation of Social Interests via Rebel Movements?

Rebel movements have far more obvious direct links to the use of violence than their civilian opponents; it is not necessary to prove this. But what can be said about the representational side of the armed movements? All in all, there have been few clear statements of what the various rebels stand for. The more political of the stated aims of rebel representatives has been “to sit down and to discuss” national problems. They have also accused the current government of corruption, mismanagement and the pursuit of narrow ethnic interests (of Bozizé’s Gbaya group). The professed readiness to join a power-sharing government might be seen as nothing more than rent-seeking behavior and not an acknowledgement of the need for more consensual decision-making²⁴ A few NGO reports consider the UFDR rebellion to have been an expression of the grievances of the Gula (Human Rights Watch 2007: 78-79). UFDR president Djotodia repeatedly criticized the “exclusionist” policies of the regime and was quoted as follows: “Many people from other ethnic groups and different political parties are ostracized and banned from participating in the management of the country.”²⁵ The best-known UFDR commander, Zaccharia Damane, cited additional grievances: the impassability of the roads in the region (Vakaga), the lack of health care, the lack of education, and the insufficient access to portable water. The most outstanding statements have come, however, from Abakar Sabone, a co-founder of the UFDR and the head of the breakaway faction MLCJ. In an interview in November 2006 with the local newspaper Le Confident, he declared that one of the reasons for starting a rebellion was Bozizé’s broken promise to appoint a Muslim prime minister.²⁶ He also alluded to the dominance of Christians in the management of state affairs,²⁷ saying that the aim of his rebel movement was to force Bozizé, through the use of arms, to accept dialogue and take “the geopolitics of our country” seriously. When the MLCJ decided to breakaway from the UFDR in summer 2008, it claimed to be working ²⁴ See, for example, the BBC and Reuters news reports which followed the capture of Birao by the UFDR in November 2006: <http://news.bbc.co.uk/2/hi/africa/6136210.stm>; http://www.iol.co.za/index.php?set_id=1&click_id=136&art_id=qw1163486881436B253 (accessed 30 July 2009).

²⁵ See <http://www.irinnews.org/Report.aspx?ReportId=61464> (accessed 9 August 2009). A party communiqué from 23 May 2008 expanded the argument, claiming that the organization would stand for the excluded silent majority of the population, <http://centrafrique-presse.over-blog.com/article-19836757.html> (accessed 27 March 2009).

²⁶ “Because he did not respect the pact linking us: It was convened that we take the power and that he manages the transition with a Muslim prime minister.” (Puisqu’il n’a pas respecté le pacte qui nous liait: il était question que nous prenons le pouvoir, qu’il gère la transition avec un premier Ministre Musulman, translation AM).

²⁷ “Listen Mr Journalist, if you want to drown your dog you have to accuse him of hydrophobia. And tell me, please, whether Central African Muslims have not the right to accede to power, because they are Muslims, Islamists and represent a danger to the nation? The Christians have governed 46 years and where are we? In paradise? No, we have to acknowledge that the CAR, our country, is a secular and democratic state where all confessions should live in peace (Christians, Muslims, animists and others).” (Écoutez Monsieur le Journaliste, lorsqu’on veut noyer son chien, on l’accuse de rage. Et dites-moi s’il vous plaît les musulmans Centrafricains de Centrafrique n’ont – ils pas droit au pouvoir parce qu’ils sont musulmans, islamistes et représentent un danger pour la nation? Les chrétiens ont gouverné 46 ans, où sommes nous? Au paradis? Non il faut reconnaître que la RCA notre pays est un Etat laïc et démocratique où doivent vivre en paix, toutes les confessions (Chrétiens, Musulmans, Animistes et Autres).) Le Confident, 8 November 2006, www.sangonet.com (accessed 30 June 2009).

for an overhaul of the political class—another bold statement.²⁸ During the inclusive political dialogue, Sabone succeeded in inscribing a recommendation in the official document that the two Muslim holidays of Aïd el-Fitr and Aïd el-Kébir should become national holidays.²⁹

Any political claims from the APRD are much more difficult to find. The group complained from its inception in 2005 that Bozizé had toppled a legitimate government in March 2003, had mismanaged public funds, and had divided the nation.³⁰ Such statements underscored the dominant impression that the APRD was fighting for Patassé's return. The exclusion of Patassé from running for the presidency in 2005 was another argument advanced by APRD officials (Human Rights Watch 2007: 38, 42), putting it firmly in one political camp. However, local commanders of the APRD were occasionally saying quite the contrary, that they had no contact at all with the former president, who they claimed was a man of the past.³¹

An occasional commentator on the private Internet platform Sangonet clearly exposed the ideological and programmatic poverty of all rebel movements and declared that their activities were nothing but criminal.³² It is difficult to come to a different conclusion. It may therefore be of greater interest to determine what the social background of rebel movements is. However, we lack clear information on recruitment practices and the ethnoregional affiliation of individual fighters. Findings from Debos (2008) corroborate the impression that many formerly pro-Bozizé fighters, some of Chadian origin, have joined the anti-Bozizé rebel movements. It thus appears that it is not political conviction but rather material gain that is their main motivation.

²⁸ See http://www.dabio.net/RCA-RETRAIT-DU-M-L-C-J-DE-CAPITAINE-ABAKAR-SABONE-de-l-UFDR_a1210.html (accessed 3 August 2009): "The necessity of an overhaul of the Central African political class, of ceasing to eternalize the interests of the old political class that has sufficiently demonstrated its limits and lack of patriotism, because we all have seen them in practice: negative results." (la nécessité d'un renouvellement de la classe politique centrafricaine de ne pas continuer de pérenniser les intérêts de cette vieille classe politique qui a suffisamment démontré ses limites et son manque de patriotisme parce que nous les avons tous vu à l'épreuve: résultats négatif.)

²⁹ Agence France-Presse, 18 November 2008.

³⁰ <http://www.irinnews.org/Report.aspx?ReportId=73544> (accessed 30 July 2009).

³¹ <http://www.irinnews.org/Report.aspx?ReportId=62793> (accessed 30 July 2009).

³² "And none of those rebels, even those who claim to be the most eloquent, such as Sabone and Gazambéti, seem to have difficulty explaining the reasons for their rebellions and convincing the citizens. They have never deemed it necessary to explain to Central Africans their real political and revolutionary ideology, which guided them really and which led to the establishment of a political opposition by initiating youths in the bush instead of giving them a professional education with perspectives different from those of robbers. (Et aucun d'entre ces rebelles, même ceux qui se voudraient les plus éloquents comme Sabone et Gazambéti sembleraient avoir des difficultés à expliquer les raisons de leurs rébellions et à convaincre les citoyens. Ils n'avaient jamais crû nécessaire d'expliquer aux centrafricains la véritable idéologie politique et révolutionnaire qui les guidait vraiment et qui avaient établi qu'une opposition politique se faisait en initiant des jeunes dans le maquis, au lieu de leur donner une éducation professionnelle avec des ouvertures autres que d'être des brigands...), 3 August 2007 (Jean-Didier Gaïna), www.sangonet.com (accessed 30 June 2009).

Armed rebellion in the CAR has, however, had an unintended political consequence. Rebel movements, their repression, and the collateral damage in terms of human rights violations have attracted the attention of the “international community”—humanitarian NGOs, the UN organizations, and the European Union. The number of recent reports on the most remote areas of the CAR—particularly on the north-east, but also on the north—is unprecedented. Who would have talked (or even known) about the Gula before the UFDR conquest of Birao? Randall speculates about the possibility that political parties themselves create the ethno-regional groups they pretend to represent (Randall 2007: 85); why can’t this also be true of rebellions? Ethnic grievances are put on the national and international agendas through rebellion—despite serious doubts about the sincerity of their promoters. And it should also be immediately added that those grievances have significantly increased in the process of rebellion and repression.

It might also be significant that the three elected members of parliament from Vakaga Prefecture—with the provincial capital Birao, the scene of major destruction in 2006/07—changed 100 percent with each election (in 1993, 1998 and 2005) and that the weight of the major parties steadily declined over the same period (1993: 2 RDC, 1 MLPC; 1998: 1 MLPC, 1 PSD,³³ 1 independent; 2005: 2 KNK, 1 independent). This may have to do generally with the viability of democracy in a country without the most basic roads infrastructure, something which makes accountability on the part of elected MPs objectively difficult as they most probably would not report back, not even on a yearly basis. For representational democracy to function this is certainly a key –impediment—objectively speaking.

It might, however, also be a sign of the failure of political parties to organize themselves efficiently in the periphery of such a country. Can rebel movements do better? The tendency of the CAR’s rebel movements to transform themselves into political parties suggests rather the contrary. Besides the rational wish to “reinvent” themselves in peaceful times (for Côte d’Ivoire see Förster 2009), this rebel-movement-to-party transition may also be in accordance with the advice of outside mediators.³⁴ In comparison to Côte d’Ivoire, it is clear that not only political parties but also rebel movements in the CAR have less to offer to the population (see Table 5).

³³ Elected PSD candidate Dieudonné Koudoufara defected to the MLPC shortly after the elections and made the formation of a majority government possible (adding to the originally elected 47 MLPC plus 2 PLD and 5 pro-Patassé independents, resulting in 55 pro-Patassé seats out of a total of 109). This kind of opportunistic behavior certainly does not go down well with an electorate. Koudoufara was a MLPC candidate in 2005 but was not elected.

³⁴ Manning (2004: 57) finds for Mozambique, Bosnia and Kosovo that “In each case, international actors made participation in elections the only way to remain a live, active political force. Return to armed conflict was precluded, and refusal to participate in elections deprived parties of legitimacy, relevance, and access to material benefits of office.”

Table 5: Rebel Movements and Conflict in the CAR

Rebel movements representing ethnoregional interests	Not programmatically, but in statements: UFDR openly, APRD (at times) implicitly. MLCJ promoting religious interests.
Level of violence exerted by individual rebel movements	Organized use of violence by the Bozizé rebellion; sporadic attacks by later rebel movements; some reports of brutality by APRD rebels
Protective functions of rebel movements	Nearly nonexistent
State reacts with repression against civilian population	Yes, thereby creating additional group grievances

Source: Author's compilation.

However, the negative outcomes of rebel activities for the population do not mean that these groups have not brought about change, particularly with regard to political space. Over decades political life was centered on Bangui and the south, and the negative consequences of the mutinies in the 1990s were concentrated there. It should be noted that the traditional political parties cared little about citizens in the remote periphery, even though the Zaraguina phenomenon (roving highway robbers, the abduction of children for ransom, and assaults on buses and small villages) is an old one and had a direct impact on the lives of Northerners for a long time. As a result of rebel activities, national and international awareness of the plight of people living in the periphery of the CAR has grown considerably over the last decade.

5 Conclusions

Political parties have lost out in the CAR's recurrent violent crisis and in the peace process. Established parties' loss of representational weight in parliament and their sidelining in both peace negotiations and dialogue processes are major indicators of this. The amount of attention given to the main political parties, and their room to maneuver, has declined rapidly since 1997. The parties themselves may bear part of the responsibility as (a) their relation to violence and violent actors has not always been clear and (b) they have offered few services to the population. Compared to other countries where peace agreements have led to sophisticated post-conflict power-sharing agreements favoring rebel movements (for example, Burundi, DR Congo), however, it may be claimed that the comparative political loss in the CAR has been limited. At the same time it has to be noted that rewarding the use of violence by admitting the perpetrators to the negotiation table after a show of force is very dangerous (Tull and Mehler 2005). This could prompt even more peaceful political parties to change their strategy, and there are convincing signs that this will indeed be the case in the CAR.

Upon closer inspection it becomes clear that the relationship between political parties and violent conflicts in the CAR is highly complex as some of the most active political entrepreneurs create or use political parties and military organizations (including rebel forces and the official army) more or less interchangeably for their political purposes. This process has clearly accelerated since 1996. The few classical parties (plus civil society) have suffered a political setback; they have not been able to make their voice heard. The donor community—interested principally in a quick, superficial peace—has largely disregarded them. Civilian political parties were invited to the two dialogue forums organized in 2003 and 2008 and contributed content-wise; however, they were absent from the peace negotiations proper. Finally, there have been very few attempts by the rebel organizations themselves to occupy political space by proposing to represent ethnic or other collective interests. Only a few, hardly convincing, claims have been voiced in this regard. With the exception of allusions to a Muslim agenda by Abakar Sabone and the vague sympathies of the UFDR for the Gula, the groups offer little in ideological terms. Claims from the rebel groups which are heard much more frequently are that their organizers will block the official security forces' attacks on civilians. The security grievances of the population are cited as a justification for armed rebellion (while rebels themselves provide the context, or at least the pretext, for the very same brutality by armed forces).

Political parties and rebel movements in the CAR may “stand for” the interests or grievances of ethnoregional groups, yet it is hard to identify many activities undertaken by these organizations which one could easily classify as “acting for” those same groups. This latter, more substantive, form of representation has until now obviously been rare—maybe because of the specific contextual conditions of the CAR. The example of Côte d'Ivoire, where rebel leaders have tried hard to create their own local legitimacy (while not standing in national elections, at least so far) and where political parties have remained the prime political actors, suggests that there could be important variations at play in post-conflict societies. Can the representative know what the interests of the represented are without consultation? This is difficult to believe. The low level of reelections to parliament in the CAR, portrayed in the case of Vakaga Prefecture, suggests that voters do not consider their deputies to be responsive to their concerns. Only at the local level is it possible that traditional forms of consultation between the population and the (local) elite may play a role; the other form of consultation is intra-elite dialogue of dubious value. It is doubtful whether rebel movements do any better than parties at representing group interests. They may get more or less voluntary popular support at times, but they cannot be held accountable by the local population they claim to defend; elected members of parliament at least face the destiny of not being re-elected. The CAR thus faces a continued crisis of representation, and both peace and democracy have suffered from the recent devaluation of political parties and the militarization of politics.

Bibliography

- Basedau, Matthias / Stroh, Alexander (2009): Ethnicity and Party Systems in Francophone Sub-Saharan Africa, GIGA Working Paper, 100, Hamburg: GIGA.
- Bradshaw, Richard (2009): Central African Republic, in: Darren J. Sagar (ed.): Political Parties of the World. 7th edition. London: John Harper Publishing, pp. 107-111.
- Bratton, Michael / van de Walle, Nicolas (1997): Democratic Experiments in Africa. Regime Transitions in Comparative Perspective. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Debos, Marielle (2008): Fluid Loyalties in a Regional Crisis. Chadian 'Ex-Liberators' in the Central African Republic, in: African Affairs, 107 (427), pp. 225-241.
- De Zeeuw, Jeroen (ed.) (2008): From Soldiers to Politicians. Transforming Rebel Movements After Civil War. Boulder/Colorado: Lynne Rienner.
- Erdmann, Gero (2007): The Cleavage Model, Ethnicity and Voter Alignment in Africa: Conceptual and Methodological Problems Revisited, GIGA Working Paper, 63, Hamburg: GIGA.
- Glasius, Marlies (2008): 'We ourselves, we are part of the functioning'. The ICC, Victims, and Civil Society in the Central African Republic, in: African Affairs, 108 (430), pp. 49-67.
- Human Rights Watch (2007): Central African Republic: State of Anarchy. Rebellion and Abuses against Civilians, September 2007.
- International Crisis Group (ICG) (2007): République Centrafricaine. Anatomie d'un Etat fantôme (Rapport Afrique N°136), 13 décembre 2007.
- Jarstad, Anna (2008): Power sharing: former enemies in joint government, in: Jarstad, Anna / Sisk, Timothy (eds.) (2008): From War to Democracy: Dilemmas of Peacebuilding. Oxford: Oxford University Press, pp. 105-133.
- Jarstad, Anna / Sisk, Timothy (eds.) (2008): From War to Democracy: Dilemmas of Peacebuilding. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Kalck, Pierre (2005): Historical Dictionary of the Central African Republic. 3rd edition. Lanham: Scarecrow Press.
- Kovacs Söderberg, Mimmi (2008): When rebels change their stripes: armed insurgenst in post-war politics, in: Jarstad, Anna / Sisk, Timothy (eds.) (2008): From War to Democracy: Dilemmas of Peacebuilding. Oxford: Oxford University Press, pp. 134-156.
- Lyons, Terrence (2005): Demilitarizing Politics: Elections on the Uncertain Road to Peace. Boulder/Col.: Lynne Rienner.
- Marchal, Roland (2009): Aux marges du monde, en Afrique centrale. Etude CERI, Paris: CERI.
- Manning, Carrie (2007): Party-Building on the Heels of War: El Salvador, Bosnia, Kosovo and Mozambique, in: Democratization, 14 (2), pp. 253-272.

- Manning, Carrie (2004): Armed Opposition Groups into Political Parties: Comparing Bosnia, Kosovo, and Mozambique, in: Studies in Comparative International Development, 39 (1), pp. 54-76.
- Mehler, Andreas (2005): The shaky foundations, adverse circumstances and limited achievements of democratic transition in the Central African Republic, in: Villalón, Leonardo A. / VonDoepp, Peter (eds.): The fate of Africa's democratic experiments: elites and institutions Bloomington/Indiana: Indiana University Press, pp. 126-152.
- Mehler, Andreas (2009): Peace and Power sharing in Africa: a not so obvious relationship, in: African Affairs, 108 (2009) 432, pp. 453-473.
- Ngoupandé, Jean-Paul (1997): Chronique de la crise centrafricain 1996-1997. Le syndrome Baracuda. Paris: L'Harmattan.
- Randall, Vicky (2007): 'Political Parties in Africa and the Representation of Social Groups', in: Basedau, Matthias / Erdmann, Gero / Mehler, Andreas (eds.): Votes, Money and Violence: Political Parties and Elections in Sub-Saharan Africa. Uppsala: Nordic Africa Institute, pp. 82-104.
- Sartori, Giovanni (1976): Parties and Party Systems. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Spittaels, Steven / Hilgert, Filip (2009): Mapping Conflict Motives: Central African Republic. Antwerpen: International Peace Information Service, online: http://www.ipisresearch.be/maps/CAR/20090217_Mapping_CAR.pdf (accessed 30 June 2009).
- Sriram, Chandra Lekha (2008): Peace and Governance. Power-sharing, Armed Groups and Contemporary Peace Negotiations. New York: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Tull, Denis / Mehler, Andreas (2005): The hidden costs of power-sharing: Reproducing insurgent violence in Africa, in: African Affairs, 104, 416, pp. 375-398.
- UNDP see United Nations Development Programme
- UNFPA/Macro International see United Nations Population Fund (UNFPA) / Bangui and Macro International
- United Nations Development Programme (2008): Rapport National sur le Développement Humain. Bangui: UNDP.
- United Nations Population Fund (UNFPA) / Bangui and Macro International (2008): Central African Republic. Atlas of HIC and AIDS Indicators 2006. Calverton: UNFPA/Bangui and Macro International.

Recent Issues

- No 115 Malte Gephart: Contextualizing Conceptions of Corruption: Challenges for the International Anti-corruption Campaign; December 2009
- No 114 Andreas Mehler: The Production of Insecurity by African Security Forces: Insights from Liberia and the Central African Republic; November 2009
- No 113 Miriam Shabafrouz: Iran's Oil Wealth: Treasure and Trouble for the Shah's Regime. A Context-sensitive Analysis of the Ambivalent Impact of Resource Abundance; November 2009
- No 112 Annegret Mähler: Oil in Venezuela: Triggering Violence or Ensuring Stability? A Context-sensitive Analysis of the Ambivalent Impact of Resource Abundance; October 2009
- No 111 Martin Beck: Oil-rent Boom in Iran?; October 2009
- No 110 Juliane Brach and Robert Kappel: Global Value Chains, Technology Transfer and Local Firm Upgrading in Non-OECD Countries; October 2009
- No 109 Heinz Jockers, Dirk Kohnert and Paul Nugent: The Successful Ghana Election of 2008 – a Convenient Myth? Ethnicity in Ghana's Elections Revisited; September 2009
- No 108 Sebastian Huhn: The Culture of Fear and Control in Costa Rica (II): The Talk of Crime and Social Changes; September 2009
- No 107 David Shim: Shrimp amongst Whales? Assessing South Korea's Regional-power Status; August 2009
- No 106 Günter Schucher: Where Minds Meet: The "Professionalization" of Cross-Strait Academic Exchange; August 2009
- No 105 Alexander Stroh: The Effects of Electoral Institutions in Rwanda: Why Proportional Representation Supports the Authoritarian Regime; July 2009
- No 104 Sebastian Huhn: The Culture of Fear and Control in Costa Rica (I): Crime Statistics and Law Enforcement; July 2009
- No 103 Günter Schucher: Liberalisierung in Zeiten der Instabilität: Spielräume unkonventioneller Partizipation im autoritären Regime der VR China [Liberalization in Times of Instability: Margins of Unconventional Participation in Chinese Authoritarianism]; June 2009
- No 102 Leslie Wehner: Power, Governance, and Ideas in Chile's Free Trade Agreement Policy; May 2009

All GIGA Working Papers are available free of charge at www.giga-hamburg.de/workingpapers.
For any requests please contact: workingpapers@giga-hamburg.de.
Editor of the Working Paper Series: Juliane Brach