University of Otago
In the 21st century, the Asia-Pacific region has been affected by a growing tension between deepening globalisation – a process powered by revolutionary changes in communication and information technologies that have made states more interconnected and more vulnerable – and the persistence of great power rivalry, a development which presupposes that the capacity of great powers to determine events remains as strong as ever. The uneasy co-existence between globalising forces and enduring Westphalian principles is creating new and difficult challenges for diplomacy in the Asia-Pacific.

The 53rd University of Otago Foreign Policy School addresses this issue by bringing together an international team of scholars, policy practitioners and observers.
